HELP US TO CONSERVE THE LEGACY OF ANTARCTIC ADVENTURE

At the turn of the twentieth century Antarctica was the focus of one of the last great races of exploration and discovery. The 'heroic age' of exploration (1897 – 1917) saw a number of men risk their lives to conquer the last great land frontier on earth – Antarctica.

This era of exploration typified leadership, courage, passion, sacrifice and sometimes tragedy.

These expeditions, led by famous explorers including Sir Ernest Shackleton, Captain Robert Falcon Scott and Roald Amundsen, built simple wooden bases from which they set out to explore the Continent. A century on four bases still stand in the Ross Sea region of Antarctica crammed full of supplies and equipment. They have been described as the most evocative heritage buildings in the world.

Antarctica remains the only continent on Earth where human's first dwellings still stand. The sites and the thousands of artefacts associated with these expeditions have suffered from the ravages of time and the harsh climate. In response, the New Zealand Antarctic Heritage Trust, recognised as caring for these sites on behalf of the international community, has launched the Ross Sea Heritage Restoration Project.

This long-term, staged conservation project aims to ensure these fascinating sites remain for the benefit of current and future generations.

YOU CAN HELP

Our members, Antarctic Explorers, are committed to conserving the legacy of discovery, adventure and endurance. By becoming a member, your support will help the Trust in a major capital raising project to conserve these sites and ensure this fascinating legacy and chapter in human history is not lost to the world.
